"Nothing easier." an ordinary composer would say, "than to pick it up again." "Nothing easier," said Rossini, "than to write a new one in the place." Rossini would not get out of hed for a mere duet. He set to work and composed another, which did not resemble II. "I have just dropped a duet," said Rossini, "I derate terms.

Wish you would get it for me. You will find it somewhere under the bed." The friend felt for the duet with him to be the duet with the due the duet with his cane, fished it out, and handed it to composer. "Now which do you like best?" asked Rossini; "I have written two." This anecdote is often told in illustration of Rossini's lazinces, as if a really active man would have got out of bed to pick up the fallen duet rather then set to work, lazily, to compose a new one. Many volumes might be written on this question. It will be sufficient, however, to point out that activity is mere livelineas of the body, as liveliness is activity of the mind. The Union is still to our minds an assembly whose debates reverberate throughout the empire; to row in the university eight is an honour worth the sacrifice certainly of learning, and possibly even of health; to be a first-class life. In the little world to which our ambition has hitherto been confined we have risen to the summit of all things; professors, and other authorities are nothing but contemptible old tuined that position when I was a freshman, on moderate terms. Thackeray speaks of the old gentleman of being flogged by the terrible head-master of his youth. In my imagination the lads who held sway in the university when I first had the honour of a gown, and who, as we foully be lieved, rivalled, in different departments, Porson and Sir Isaac Newton, and Pitt, and Coloridge, Rinson & Co. Apply to: and Byron, are still surrounded by a glory exceeding that of any of the men. But a cynical freshman would be an impossible creature. Most men suon part with their university bloom: the world demolishes their splendid ideal, and even Oxford and Cambridge sink to be provinced towns with a large proportion of cultivated men ! of virtue and learning.
